

JK Global Opportunities Fund

October 2022

USD Class -0.57%, GBP Class -0.56%, YEN Class -0.93%, EUR Class -0.75% in October.

The Fund fell -0.57% (USD Class, net of fees) in October, the main cause of which was our short position in the Euro Stoxx Banks index, costing the Fund 37bps. Despite a flattening yield curve, banks seem to be benefiting from narrowing credit spreads recently and a higher interest rate environment. However, as growth slows, we expect bond yields to retreat and credit risk to become the driving factor again. As such, we remain short.

Despite worse than expected September US CPI data, rising bond yields, and some mixed earnings at best, equities managed to eke out a decent gain in October. Hawkish rhetoric from Powell at this month's FOMC meeting reversed some of this, however markets have generally been resilient in the face of recent headwinds.

On the whole, markets still find themselves in a "tug of war" between what central banks are saying on the one hand, vs. what they will actually do on the other. Our sense is that the latter of these two is starting to hold more influence on markets, suggesting that the "peak rate" narrative is gaining momentum with investors. Despite Powell's best efforts to jawbone a hawkish message into markets, investors appear to be taking this less seriously than at any point recently. We believe this is due to a few things.

Firstly, central banks elsewhere have started to "blink" with respect to their own tightening campaigns. For example, we saw "dovish hikes" from the Canadian and Australian central banks last month, not to mention the Bank of England intervention not too long ago.

In addition, leading economic indicators are starting to paint a picture of disinflation and general macro weakness. Shipping freight rates and port congestion have collapsed; housing, semiconductor, and used car prices have corrected sharply; delivery times have come down; inventories have been rebuilt; and China's PPI has slipped into deflation. As of writing, the October US CPI figure has come in lower than expected, providing further evidence of this.

We always come back to the fact that there is simply too much debt in the world to accommodate such high interest rates for long. At some point, things begin to "break", which is ultimately a deflationary force. As mentioned, we are already starting to see evidence of this, which will likely lead central banks to U-turn sooner than they think.

These developments have led us to reverse our long Dollar position, which has been a constant in the Fund this year. As we enter the later innings of the FED's rate hiking cycle, we see limited room for the Dollar to rise much from here, particularly with long positioning so stretched. The intervention from the Bank of Japan was also a seminal moment in our view, symbolising the unease that other central banks were having with relentless dollar strength. The upshot, is that we believe we are at a medium-term inflection point in the Dollar and have initiated a 10% net short position as a result.

The combination of a falling dollar and peaking rates will help ease financial conditions. As such, we have cautiously been rebuilding exposure to equities, particularly in the US and Japan, where we feel the risk/reward is most attractive. Earnings in Japan have been very encouraging of late, and we continue to like the cheapness of the equity market and currency – particularly from the perspective of foreign investors, who are significantly underweight.
