

JK Global Opportunities Fund

January 2017

The Fund rose +2.97% in January (GBP Class, Net of Fees).

The Fund rose +2.97% during the month, driven by strong contributions from the bond and equity books. Currencies posted a small negative contribution, largely down to the short CNY position.

Bond markets continue to sell-off, albeit in a fairly orderly manner. However, the first signs of more serious deterioration are starting to emerge, in particular, in the form of widening spreads within Europe - French and Italian bonds are starting to widen out meaningfully relative to German bonds, a trend that we expect to continue and from which we are positioned to benefit. The BOJ has also seen its first real test, as they manipulate the 10 year rate at the 0% level and we expect many more. Economic data on the whole is rather encouraging, and inflation is showing signs of life. Another problem for bonds, and we haven't even mentioned the imminent 'tapering' planned by the ECB.

Equities, and in particular the Fund's holdings in Asia did well in January. Samsung, Jardine Matheson, and Prada all posted decent gains. Asian equity markets look cheap to us, both in absolute and relative terms, although the political landscape and our concerns over China prevent us from moving aggressively into the asset class. The conundrum is that the US equity market looks strong technically despite being rather expensive. The UK market looks good as well, and Europe has some compelling value opportunities. All in all, we are trying not to become too bearish on equities, despite the obviously volatile political landscape. Maybe this volatility will show up more in bond markets this year?

We noted last month how the consensus had shifted towards an expectation of a strong Dollar. Whilst we have empathy with this view, we would note that the greenback is not that cheap. Contrarians should buy Sterling and the Mexican Peso if they want real value (which we do).

Turning to the Renminbi, our models suggest it is not that cheap. Furthermore, we know that unlimited money/credit creation ultimately leads to inflation and/or currency depreciation. Given that China are rewriting the book on credit creation and debt accumulation, the ability to control all aspects of policy, principally the exchange rate and monetary policy, will prove futile unless the capital account is closed. Closing the capital account is no longer an option (although they are trying quite hard at the moment), so currency depreciation will prove the path of least resistance. Aggressive tariff imposition will only accelerate the process.
