

JK Global Opportunities Fund

March 2020

USD Class -5.25%, GBP Class -5.86%, YEN Class -5.67%, EUR Class -5.69% in March.

The Fund fell -5.25% (USD Class, net of fees) in March. March was one of the most extreme market environments we have ever witnessed, as investors grappled with a unique set of health, economic, social, and political factors brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic.

We won't pontificate on all of these here, as our insight is no better than anyone else's. What we can say is that we reduced risk exposures quite aggressively once it became clear that the virus was spreading globally, limiting downside. Our portfolio hedges provided further downside protection, although the performance of gold was slightly disappointing. The long YEN position worked well, and profits have been taken. We have retained the Fund's long gold position and will add on weakness. We took advantage of the significant uptick in market volatility to engage in various option strategies which added further value during the month – mainly writing put options on equity market indices. We also 'upgraded' the portfolio, purchasing quality companies with strong balance sheets and earnings resilience.

Our current view (fluid as it is), is that risk assets probably test previous lows made a couple of weeks ago, and that these lows hold. Whilst some sort of 'V' shaped global recovery is arguably largely discounted in current prices (as opposed to a 'W'), the consensus expectation is that the recovery will be fairly muted; the US Dollar will be strong; and that financial markets will remain shaky. Given we are heading into what can only be described as a most unclear earnings season, this consensus view seems reasonable.

However, we need to frame any view in the context of what is a virtually unprecedented US-led, global stimulus - approximately US$6.5 trillion of QE and 6.5% of World GDP through fiscal spending. The annual growth in global liquidity is headed 'through the roof'. Post GFC, we at JK have consistently underestimated the ability of the authorities to contain downside risks, and this time could well prove no different, despite the most disconcerting current environment. Thus, whilst not our base case, we need to be alert to the possibility of a more optimistic medium-term financial and economic outturn, likely resulting in a weaker US Dollar, bullish equity markets, and rising bond yields.

Clearly, a peak in new Coronavirus cases in the US over the next couple of weeks may provide the market with the visibility it needs to start pricing in a recovery. The gradual resumption of factories in China over the last six weeks proves that there is light at the end of the tunnel post-lockdown, despite a limited policy boost. Applying a similar timeline to western economies means we can expect to see their partial reopening towards the end of April and throughout May. Indeed, governments in Europe who have seen a peak in new cases are already starting to plan their exit strategies. Evidence that government lending schemes are being tapped by businesses may also raise hopes that recent redundancies are reversed given the loans turn into grants if laid-off workers are rehired.

An exact roadmap of how things will develop is impossible to predict. Doubts over whether governments can roll out extensive testing and contact tracing regimes will cloud the timing of lockdown restrictions ending, and second round effects from unemployment and defaults will linger, casting doubts on the shape of any recovery. But given how bearish the news flow is surrounding these, our base case is for the general direction of travel to incrementally improve from here. Recessions end after activity has troughed, not when economies are back up to speed. And assuming that the virus is contained soon, we anticipate that GDP will start to rebound in the third quarter of this year. If so, the coming recession could be one of the shortest, despite being one of the deepest, since the Great Depression. If that is the case, history suggests that the stock market will recover, and quickly, particularly in light of the current policy response. The main risk to this view is a failure to get the virus under control, the consequences of which would be dire.

In summary, given the large range of potential outcomes caused by COVID-19, we continue to adopt a relatively conservative strategy. However, for the reasons alluded to above, we do feel that what asymmetry exists, exists to the upside for risk assets.

JK Global Opportunities Fund is a weekly dealing UCITS fund. It can be held by ISA's, SIPP's, Pensions, Charities, Family Offices, Endowments, as a direct holding or through a Private Wealth Manager. All classes have UK Reporting Status.
