September 2019

USD Class -1.06%, GBP Class -1.19%, YEN Class -1.29%, EUR Class -1.31% in September.

Global equities drifted higher in September despite 'hawkish cuts' from the FED and ECB, some mixed data and the impeachment inquiry launched against Trump. The disparity of opinions in both central banks on whether to cut or not raised concerns that future easing might be limited. This didn't seem to change market pricing too much however, leaving a large disparity between investors' interest rate expectations and the FED's "dot-plot". According to the "dot-plot", the odds of rates below 1.5% by the end of next year are close to zero, whilst probabilities derived from the futures market puts the chances of sub-1.5% at about 75%. Resilient price action in equity markets suggest that investors have high confidence in the FED eventually catching up to market pricing, a trend that has been repeated all year. Investors effectively believe the FED has outsourced monetary policy to markets, which are currently forecasting more cuts. We tend to agree with this view which probably explains why markets continue to look through any near-term weakness in the data.

We are cautiously optimistic that US monetary conditions will continue to support asset prices and worldwide economic activity for the foreseeable future. The FED will again increase the size of its balance sheet at its October meeting as interbank markets have boxed the FOMC into adding welcomed stimulus to the global economy. Allowing commercial bank excess reserves to grow anew is akin to stealth QE, although they will deny this. This will have a greater positive impact for global growth compared with rate cuts alone as it will relieve funding pressures in the offshore dollar market caused by a global dollar shortage and likely stem dollar appreciation.

Near term however, the market will continue to be dominated by trade developments and incoming data. With the recent headlines on trade still mixed and markets constantly changing their mind on whether bad news is actually bad news, or in fact good news, a degree of volatility is set to remain. A case in point was the beginning of this month when the market sold off on a disappointing US manufacturing PMI, only to rally a couple of days later after a disappointing services PMI. The market seems to be stuck in a "show me" phase, where only a clear improvement in the economic data and/or a meaningful thawing in US-China trade relations will see stocks move sustainably higher.

Whilst there are clearly downside risks to both of these things happening, we are mindful that positioning and sentiment are very cautious implying a low hurdle for exceeding expectations. We would also note that equity valuations are looking quite attractive, particularly outside of the US. These valuations are even more attractive on an equity risk premium basis given the extraordinary moves we've seen in bond markets this year.

It is still too early to fully engage with this rosier outlook in our view, but we are starting to see signs that things are improving, leading us to wonder whether we might have had most of the bad news. The US and China seem to be edging closer to some sort of interim deal which could see the US delaying future tariffs and easing restrictions on blacklisted companies (e.g. Huawei), in exchange for China buying more US agricultural products and giving more assurances on IP protection. This may not address the more complex, structural issues surrounding China's state-led economic model (e.g.

state intervention/subsidies), but it is certainly a step in the right direction. Even a temporary trade deal will unleash some pent-up demand and provide a cyclical boost to CAPEX and global trade.

In addition, many of the leading indicators we look at seem to be stabilising. U.S. broad money is recovering for example. After falling to 0.9% last November, U.S. real M2 growth is expanding at a 3% annual rate, a pace in keeping with the end of mid-cycle slowdowns. Credit activity is also picking up. Corporate bond issuance is firming and, according to the Fed's Senior Loan Officer Survey, demand for loans is rebounding across the board. The yield collapse is boosting credit growth across the G-10. We saw some anecdotal evidence of this when companies such as Disney, Deere, Caterpillar, Apple and Coca-cola tapped credit markets in early September, raising $58bn in just two days. Indicators in more cyclical parts of the economy are also starting to fare better such as US housing and Asian semiconductor exports. It's becoming increasingly clear that inventory levels in the latter are starting to normalise which should provide a boost to the tech cycle in Asia, particularly as 5G begins to roll-out over the next few quarters.

With global policy easing set to continue (monetary and fiscal), bearish sentiment, undemanding valuations and improving data/trade relations, we naturally feel as if we should be adding risk. However we've been in this situation a couple of times already this year with previous attempts of getting in early proving unsuccessful. Therefore, we are waiting for a clearer sign that the political landscape has calmed down and we're out of this downturn before fully re-engaging with any market rally.

Last month, we also initiated a long sterling position as we viewed the odds of a deal becoming more likely as we approached the deadline, something the market was not pricing at $1.22/£.
